

The Ramona Isbell Letter: A Heartbreaking Plea for Justice in the Emmett Till Case

On August 24, 1955, a 14-year-old black boy named Emmett Till was brutally murdered in Money, Mississippi. Till had been accused of whistling at a white woman, and two white men, Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam, decided to take matters into their own hands.

Till was abducted from his great-uncle's home in the middle of the night. He was then taken to a barn, where he was beaten and tortured. Till's body was later found in the Tallahatchie River, with a 75-pound cotton gin fan tied around his neck.

Till's murder sent shockwaves throughout the country. It was a stark reminder of the racism and violence that black people faced in the South.

Till's mother, Mamie Till Mobley, was determined to see those responsible for her son's death brought to justice.

In the months following Till's murder, Mobley wrote a letter to the NAACP. In the letter, she recounted the horrific events surrounding her son's murder and expressed her determination to see those responsible brought to justice.

The letter, which became known as the Ramona Isbell Letter, was a powerful and moving plea for justice. It helped to galvanize the civil rights movement and bring national attention to the case of Emmett Till.

The letter begins with Mobley describing the last time she saw her son alive. She writes:

““I saw my son for the last time on August 24, 1955, at about 7:30 p.m. He was a happy and healthy boy, full of life and laughter. He was excited about going to Mississippi to visit his cousins.””

Mobley then goes on to describe the events surrounding her son's murder. She writes:

““On August 28, 1955, I received a telegram from Mississippi telling me that my son had been killed. I was shocked and horrified. I couldn't believe that someone could be so cruel and heartless as to kill a child."”

Mobley then describes the pain and suffering she endured in the aftermath of her son's death. She writes:

“The pain of losing my son is unbearable. I can't eat or sleep. I can't even think straight. I just want justice for my son. I want the people who killed him to be brought to justice.””

Mobley's letter concludes with a plea for help. She writes:

“I need your help. I need you to help me find justice for my son. I need you to help me make sure that his death was not in vain.””

The Ramona Isbell Letter was a powerful and moving plea for justice. It helped to galvanize the civil rights movement and bring national attention to the case of Emmett Till. The letter remains a reminder of the racism and violence that black people faced in the South, and it continues to inspire people to fight for justice.
